EXPERTISE

Research. I study the roles of socioeconomics and technology in consumer markets, focusing on their implications for marketing and its interfaces with operations, engineering, and information systems. To this end, I develop and apply tools from econometrics, Bayesian statistics, automatic control, optimization, and high-performance computing, supported by theories from microeconomics, industrial organization, psychology, and sociology. Most of this work pertains to pricing, branding, assortment, and product line decisions in automotive markets, retailing, e-commerce, and consumer packaged goods.

Teaching. My specialty is business analytics and data science at both undergraduate and graduate levels. I teach the conceptual foundations and the practical application of data analysis tools, through the case method, in-class labs, and consulting assignments with major consumer goods companies. Delivered in face-to-face, distributed, and mixed formats, my courses emphasize critical thinking and highly-structured best practices to tackle the complexity of real-life problems.
